Suppose a stock you own dropped by 30% but you were sure it would bounce back. Imagine it then fell another 20% but it was clear the fundamentals were solid. Maybe you bought a little more on the dip. Now imagine the same stock is down 15% intraday and the grind of daily disappointment has given way to certain knowledge that you bought a loser that could go even lower. Selling the stock as a result would be an act of capitulation. Investors can only identify capitulations with certainty after they have occurred and the price has rebounded. Note that the stock was already down 15% in a day, suggesting others felt the same. While misery may like company, a capitulation requires a panicked crowd. Capitulation mean the sellers were "wrong" or the buyers "right." While a short-term rebound follows capitulation by definition, it doesn't mean prices can't go even lower later, if future reverses turn the new "strong hands" into sellers. Bear markets can feature repeat high-volume plunges in price and premature calls of capitulation. The truth is that the condition can be diagnosed conclusively only in hindsight, if the price rebounds. Capitulations often signal major turning points in the price action of underlying securities and financial instruments. Technical analysts use candlestick charts to identify capitulation patterns. One such pattern is the hammer candle, which marks a trading session in which the price drops well below its opening level but reverses to regain much of the loss by the close. When accompanied by heavy volume, it suggests the decline reached a climax. Image by Julie Bang A © Investopedia A 2020 Conversely, a shooting star candle describing a session in which price rallies sharply but then reverses to close near opening level often forms at the end of a buying spree, indicating a top is in place. While capitulations can be hard to tell apart from The high volume decline as they occur, are easy to spot with the hindsight: just look for a significant rebound of the price. On 18 March 2020, the S&P 500 index fell by almost 10% compared to the closing of the previous day in the Covid-19 market, only to reverse and close 5.2% on the day and 1.6% down where it opened. It wasn't enough capitulation, however, back. On March 23, 2020, the S & P 500 fell almost 5% intraday to the minimum but managed to close with a loss of "only" 2.9%. We know it was capitulation because the index continued to earn 17% compared to the next week. Synonymous Word Shape: capitulated capitulating to capitulate is surrender or surrender to all requests.
